With Architecture Depends, architect and critic Jeremy Till offers a proposal for rescuing architects from themselves: a way to bridge the gap between what architecture actually is and what architects want it to be. Mixing anecdote, design, social theory, and personal experience, Till's writing is always accessible, moving freely between high and low registers, much like his suggestions for architecture itself.

Jeremy Till offers a critical, if not polemical, insight on questions relative to future practice, the architect's shifting role, architecture's engagement, etc. Architecture depends on internal and external factors. In this respect, the discipline should be more connected to society rather than being only focused on the building and its site.

Jeremy Till suggests that architecture is like the occupants of this building: removed from the life of the city in an ivory tower, constantly moving but going nowhere. I read this section of Architecture Depends while on a train to Sheffield to give a lecture in the Arts Tower.

Architecture Depends — Jeremy Till — htcsiddharth

Architecture, Jeremy Till argues with conviction in this engaging, sometimes pugnacious book, cannot help itself; it is dependent for its very existence on things outside itself. Despite the claims of autonomy, purity, and control that architects like to make about their practice, architecture is buffeted by uncertainty and contingency.
