Theory of organizational commitment. A distinguished theory in organizational commitment is the Three-Component Model (TCM). According to this theory, there are three distinct components of organizational commitment: Affective commitment: This is the emotional attachment an employee has towards the organization. This part of TCM says that an employee has a high level of active commitment, then the chances of an employee staying with the organization for long are high.

Organizational Commitment: Definition, benefits, and How ...

Organizational commitment is when a member of a certain group identifies himself with the group and is willing to work intensely on its behalf. In these cases, an organizationally committed person takes a large part of his personal identity from the group and has positive associations with it. This is not the same as organizational identification or motivation, but is much broader than both.
