'The power of Louise Erdrich's writing lies in the clear access she has to her characters' thoughts and feelings, and her ability to translate those feelings into words that are both poetic and unforced. "The Bingo Palace" is a beautiful novel, mysterious and revelatory, from a powerful American voice.' Erica Wagner, The Times

The fourth in a quartet of related novels, The Bingo Palace features Lipsha Morrissey, the son of June Kashpaw and Gerry Nanapush, characters from all of the interconnected families in Erdrich's previous books. The Bingo Palace is the main symbol of the story - a structure planned for a site on an Ojibwe reservation - a site considered sacred to Native Americans.

In The Bingo Palace, American novelist Louise Erdrich writes in the same vein as her previous fiction books in the Love Medicine series — Love Medicine, Tracks, and Beet Queen — which document the complex realities of daily life on a fictional Chippewa, or Ojibwe, reservation in North Dakota. The Bingo Palace primarily follows Lipsha Morrissey, the story's protagonist, as he returns from life in the city to his home on the reservation and becomes reconnected to his spiritual and cultural ...

Reviewed in the United States on January 26, 2018. Verified Purchase. Louise Erdrich strikes me as one of very few contemporary authors who are creating something new in fiction. Literary scholars publish articles on her books because she explores complex, nuanced, multicultural community and family dynamics in original, powerful ways. For one thing, the stories of the families in Bingo Palace are explored through three generations, from myriad and completely different angles, through the ...
