His publisher disagreed, although there is a chapter in If This is a Man called Drowned and Saved. Levi's preoccupation with the role in the camp of differences in power, privilege, luck, and alliances-of-convenience runs throughout his work. It is a topic that still deserves much more attention than it has received.

The Drowned and the Saved, however, was written 40 years later and is the work of memory and reflection not only on the original events, but also on how the world has dealt with the Holocaust in the intervening years. Fundamental to his purpose is the fear that what happened once can happen (and in some respects, has happened) again.

Shortly after completing THE DROWNED AND THE SAVED, Primo Levi committed suicide. The matter of his death was sudden, violent and unpremeditated, and there were some who argue that he killed himself because he was tormented by guilt - guilt that he had survived the horrors of Auschwitz while others, better than he, had gone to the wall.

The Drowned and the Saved. Some prisoners in the camp seem to be destined to survive, while others are resigned to dying. The prisoners call the latter "mussulman." On the other hand, those who can get "prominent" positions have it relatively easy. These positions include the cooks, camp officials, Kapos, and overseers of the toilets and baths. Survival in the concentration camp, Primo points out, is a constant struggle, and it's difficult not to completely sell out your own moral code in ...

Although in normal society, one might fall somewhere in between the drowned and the saved, in the Lager, there is no middle ground. Drowning is the easiest path to take, since it requires no action. One must simply eat what they are given, obey orders, and keep their head down until exhaustion, fatigue, or misfortune takes them.
